April 9, 2026

As CEO/Founder at Stable Options LLC, I had the privilege of working with Sloan Loudon-Robins for the entire 2025 academic school year while she was enrolled at Texas State University in the Senior Capstone Program. She held the position as the project manager. My role was to provide her and her team with preliminary research and the infancy data for a sensor networking system that will measure different variables and communicate its importance regarding real estate structures.

During her term Sloan invariably demonstrated exceptional analytical skills, leadership qualities and collaboratory skills. Sloan played a pivotal role in the development of the first iteration of my prototype. At the beginning of the term Sloan and her team of electrical engineers were asked to collaborate with two teams from the civil engineering department. The civil teams were tasked with building simulation models with specs given to them by the electrical team to compliment electricals' sensors. While all teams were encouraged and agreed to have weekly Scrum meetings, Sloan's team by which she was the Scrum master effectively met with me weekly and understood the assignment. The two civil teams decided they did not want or need to meet with me weekly and were in breach of the agreement. When the second half of the year came, neither team from civil was able to deliver the agreed-upon deliverables by the deadline. All was not lost though because Sloan's team had their own Apollo 13 moment. They built their own simulation model for their sensors and it resulted in them winning the competition for best in the industry project by unprecedented margins. Sloan was not only reliable and dedicated but also exhibited a strong work ethic and commitment to achieving the team's goals. Sloan kept the ship sailing peacefully without me even knowing how unengaged and unprepared the civil teams were during the whole term. She was meeting with civil weekly and that was Sloan going above and beyond the call of duty and holding her team accountable.

In addition to her professional skills, Sloan exhibited a positive attitude and distinguished interpersonal skills. She was well liked by her peers and displayed a genuine ability to collaborate with others and create a supportive and productive work environment. I am confident that Sloan will be an invaluable asset to any organization she joins and will make meaningful contributions in her new role. I solidly endorse Sloan without reservation and believe she will exceed all expectations placed in her remit. My organization would not hesitate to hire Sloan if ever given the chance to do so when the necessary resources are in place.
